Bigger articles lead to bigger engagement...

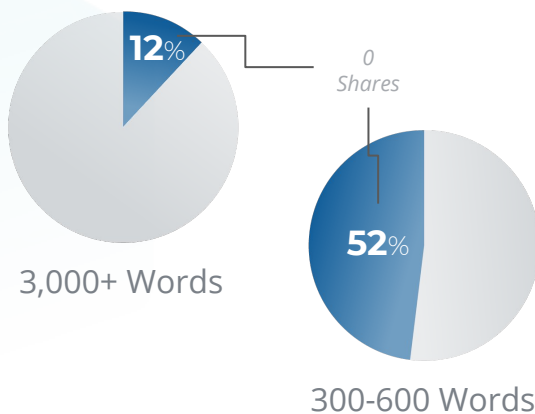

In December 2019, our colleagues at SEMrush published a study on "The Anatomy of Top Performing Articles." And after they analyzed the engagement rates on 700,000+ articles, one set of their key takeaways centered on article length.

Without a doubt, longer articles perform better:

Articles with 3,000+ words get 3x more traffic, 4x more social shares, and 3.5x more backlinks than articles of average length (901-1200 words).

Articles with 3,000+ words get 6.4x more traffic, 4.5x more social shares, and 5x more backlinks than short articles (300-600 words).

Only 12% of articles with 3,000+ words had 0 shares, while 52% of short articles (300-600 words) had 0 shares.

And we've added bigger data to offer further insights...

To take the SEMrush study a step further, we pulled matching word-count ranges from our VoiceGraph index of more than 630,000+ articles posted 2014-2019 in the Food & Beverage industry.

Our proprietary VoiceGraph technology indexes more than 73,000 publishers daily and uses machine learning to map articles to more than 200 business categories. Our VoiceGraph index currently includes more than 106,000,000 articles — and rising.

And here are some further questions we were able to answer for Food & Beverage...

What is the distribution of articles in Food & Beverage categories?

Our VoiceGraph index mapped 630,000+ Food & Beverage articles from thousands of sites into seven main categories. Articles were most frequently published in Cooking and Restaurants.

Category Distribution of Food & Beverage Articles

Top Food & Beverage Categories

of Websites Indexed

Category	# of Websites Indexed
Restaurants	8,390
Cooking	7,901
Alcoholic Beverages	7,071
Agriculture	6,550
Food Services	6,187
Nutrition	5,476
Restaurant Management	2,504

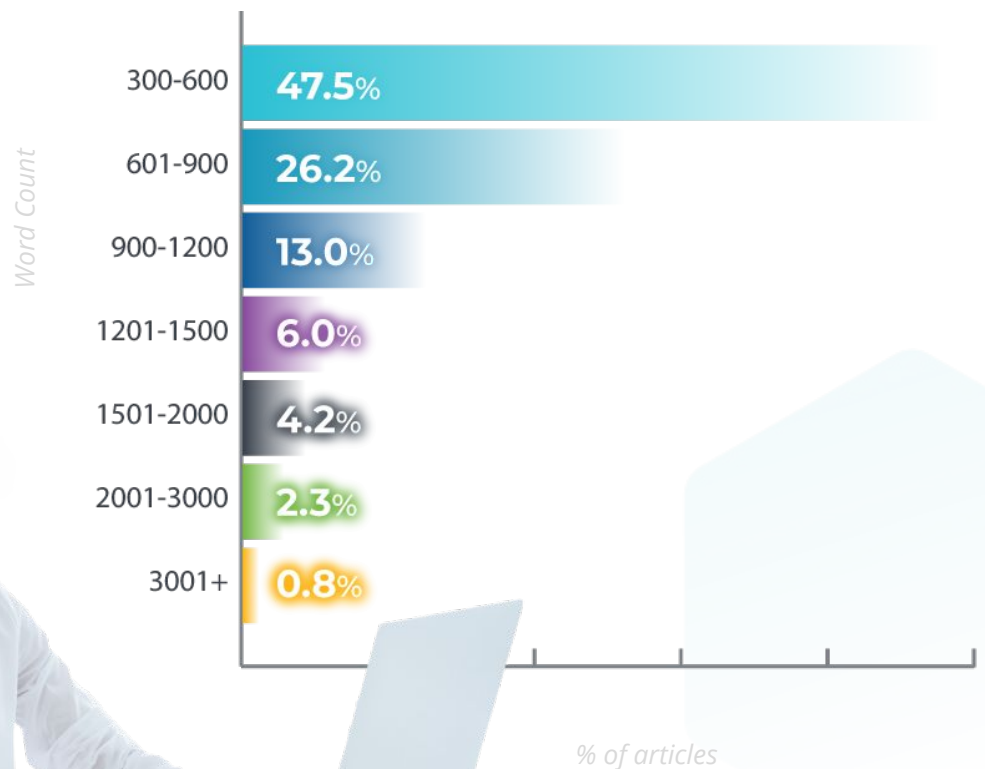

What are the typical article word counts in the Food & Beverage industry?

When we looked at 94,000+ new Food & Beverage articles published in 2019, we found less than half were the shortest length (those 300-600 words). Overall, the small percentage of longest articles shows that there is still ample room to beat competitors in the less-crowded long-form content space.

How have Food & Beverage article word counts changed?

After analyzing 630,000+ articles in Food & Beverage, we found a marked shift away from the shortest articles (those 300-600 words). The segment of longest articles (those over 2000 words) had the fastest relative rate of growth compared to other word count ranges — more than doubling over five years.

Key takeaways....

The long-form space is still growing.

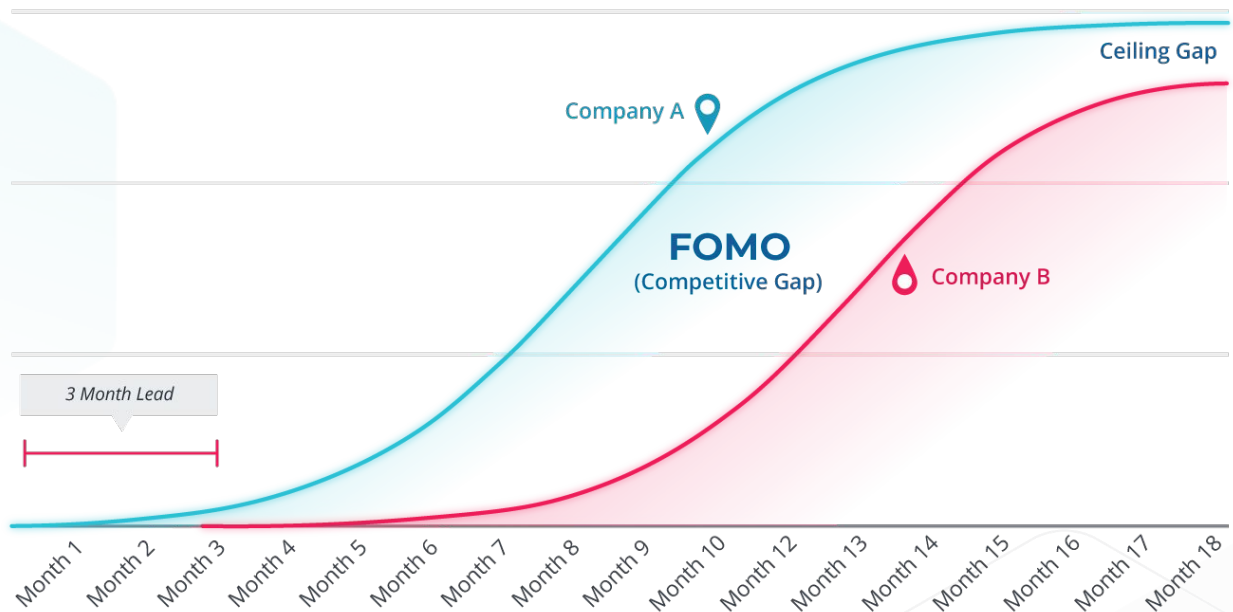

Although long-form articles still represent a small overall percentage of Food & Beverage articles, there are definitely indications that your competitors might have caught on already, as there is a growing trend from shorter to longer, more authoritative content. Fortunately, the long-form space is still not saturated.

So mind the FOMO gap.

Without a doubt, longer-form content performs better. But don't miss out on organic traffic. The longer you wait to create content, the more traffic you might lose to your competitors. Even short lead times in publishing can lead to long-term traffic advantages, especially if you win the audience share first — and keep on top.
